strange Indian tribe further west. Grard never deceived the fierce Indian chieftain. He soon made his way to the confidence and affection of his new friends, and in due time was permitted to roam at will with the boys in charge of the pony herds. He accompanied Sitting Bull in many of his raids on the posts of the upper Missouri, and became an expert in riding, shooting and other accomplishments which go to make up an Indian.

In the siege of Fort Pease, about a year ago, he succeeded in making his escape, but was recaptured and his life saved through the interference of Sitting Bull himself. It was not until the great council, held at Red Cloud last September, that Grard succeeded in making a final and successful escape. He made his way to Fort Laramie, where he has been employed ever since by the government in the capacity of scout and interpreter.

Frank Grard, unlike most of the frontier scouts and Indian interpreters, is quite talkative, and loves to speak of his old friends of the Yellowstone country. He spent nine years with the Sioux of the North, and entirely won their confidence. He is at present twenty-four years of age, dressed in civilized costume, wears none of the tawdry tinseled decorations generally worn by the Indians, and makes no outward display whatever. In speaking of Sitting Bull and the expected campaign, Grard said he expected a long, bitter and stubborn war before his adopted father would give way, and then, if whipped, the Sioux would join their brethren in the British possessions. Like all other frontiersmen, Grard has a supreme contempt for the peace policy of the government, and said that the Indians laugh at the idea of treaty-making.

Since the interview Frank Grard has become quite noted and is the central figure in Crook's campaign. It was his advice which saved Crook's shattered and crippled expedition from annihilation after the battle on the Rosebud. When Crook ordered pursuit into the Rosebud mountains Grard discovered and showed the country full of ambushes and overpowering herds of Sioux, and by his advice Crook withdrew to his supply camp on Goose creek. As Grard will figure quite prominently in the forthcoming Indian war, this brief sketch of his life will prove quite interesting.

A Lady's Description of the Prince of Montenegro.

Cornhill Magazine.]

Presently an individual, evidently high in office, introduced himself as Aid-de-camp of the Prince. He told us that apartments had been prepared for us in the old palace, where we were to be the guests of royalty. "If you wait a moment here," he added, "you will see his Highness pass." We did so, and were rewarded by as romantic a sight as this prosy nineteenth century has to show. It was like a scene out of a medieval romance. The Prince and all his "Perianthes," or bodyguard, were in their beautiful National dress; the Prince being distinguished from his retainers by a light-blue mantle thrown over his shoulders. All of them—and they numbered a hundred—were splendid looking fellows, but none of them surpassed the chief. He was a man of about thirty-five, six feet four in height, and acknowledged as the strongest and most muscular person in his dominions, which is saying a great deal. His face was open and frank, and usually wore a very sweet smile, which conferred on it a look of singular gentleness. "E bello, il nostro principe?" said our guide in broken Italian, and we certainly agreed with him. As we passed the Prince and his bodyguard they saluted us with distinguished courtesy, and we continued our route to the hospitable quarters prepared for us, right glad to sit down by a warm fire and forget the deep snow and bitter cold outside. After an hour of this luxury, however, we summoned up our courage and determined to sally out and see some of the sights of the place. Close to our quarters, and overshadowing the public fountain, stands the "Tree of Justice," for Montenegro is a happy country, that knows neither Parliament nor law court, and where the people address all their appeals and grievances to the ear of the Prince himself, who sits underneath the tree, and either decides between the disputants or refers them to the Montenegrin Code of Laws. During fine and open weather, people come from all the country round to consult their Prince, his decision on any point, we were told, never being disputed. Capital punishment in the form of shooting is inflicted for murder. It was instituted by Danilo, to put an end to the vendetta which existed, and which were transmitted from father to son, and from family to family. Imprisonment follows theft and acts of violence; but the longest term is seven years, during which time the condemned are allowed to go about in the day time, and although marked men, they are trusted to go even as far as Cattaro. They have to pay so much a day for their keep, and are sometimes employed on public works; but the women receive no education, but are nevertheless subject to the same penalty and incarceration as men. Their ideas of morality are extremely strict, and any breach of decorum is visited with the greatest severity. Next morning we were awakened betimes by violent storms of rain and wind, for a sou'wester had set in, bringing with it a thaw. Nothing more dreary could be imagined than the view that greeted us from our bedroom window. A thick mist hung over everything, only allowing glimpses now and then of the wild-looking hills that surround the plain. To the left lay the new palace, the residence of the Prince, with its small piece of garden reclaimed from the surrounding waste, but presenting at that moment only the aspect of mud. Just imagine what were our feelings when, under such circumstances, we received an invitation, which was equivalent to a command, to dine with the Prince that evening! How were we possibly to get across the flooded streets en grand tenue? For such a thing as a carriage has never been seen in Cetinje. As we were in Montenegro, however, we felt we must do as the Montenegrins do. So, braving the elements, we mounted the little horses that had taken us up the Scala, and trotted across to our destination in time for our 7 o'clock dinner. We were soon in the well-lighted, comfortable hall of the palace, where with great difficulty we disengaged ourselves of waterproofs and ulsters; thence we were shown up stairs between rows of servants in the national dress. After crossing a small, but prettily furnished ante-room, with Eastern carpets and parquet floor, we were ushered into the Prince's presence. Unfortunately, the Princess was too ill to appear, but he introduced us to a dear little fellow of seven, his son, who looked quite bewitching in his Montenegrin costume. The Prince has this one son and six daughters. Prince Nicholas talks French with perfect fluency. He spent two years in France, and "all those two years I sighed to be back in Montenegro," he said; adding, "We Montenegrins suffer dreadfully from home-sickness when we are away. There is no pleasure in the world to me like hunting the chamois or the deer on my native hills, and feeling that I am among my own people."

they would, no doubt, hardly have received more than a few moments' attention. But men of letters are few now; we have writers of scientific books and learned books, and these are often badly written, but letters are not cultivated now for their own sake, for the mere pleasure of couching fine thoughts in fine language; and when we come across some waif of the grand literary epoch which has just come to a close, we are both charmed and surprised as by some unexpected and extraordinary discovery."
